I think, it is good to learn responsible money management right from the beginning of your poker career. But that being said it is kind of silly to talk about a bankroll for 2NL online cash games. If you lose 10 Bls, its still only 20$, and redepositing that kind of money should be possible for anyone, who have time to play poker. Otherwise its probably a better idea to spend your time doing something about your financial situation like writing job applications. Moreover its not even possible to have a bankroll, that will protect you from having to redeposit, unless you are a winning player. And often people asking about bankroll for 2NL dont yet know, if they are winning players. So how much money to deposit in your poker account is really not the most important thing for a 2NL player to worry about.

But if you do want to practice bankroll management right from the beginning, and think you might be a winning player, then it is reasonable to start with something like a 100$ deposit. This will allow you to lose some bullets without having to dig out the credit card again and again. And it will also allow you to move to 5NL relatively quickly. The lowest limits are really only for practicing, not for making money, so you should not stick around there for longer, than you have to.
